Abstract

In this paper, the architecture of the international criminal courts is analysed. Nowadays there are several types of international criminal courts – permanent international, ad hoc international and ad hoc internationalised court. They all act at the same period of time, leaving the need for elaboration on their origins, goals, success and diversities. The main goal of this research is to reveal whether there are any kind of lawfulness when establishing concrete type of a court and whether the international community is approaching to the model of preferably one universal permanent court or several ad hoc courts established on the case-by-case basis.

Keywords: International criminal law, permanent international court, ad hoc international court, ad hoc internationalised court
Introduction

This year marks a hundred years of the term crimes against humanity. It is, much more importantly, 100 years since the tremendous massacre over million and a half of people have been commenced – massacre over Armenians, today marked as the genocide. But, what is more important for this paper is another point of view to this crime – its prosecution before an international criminal court.

Theory of International Public Law (IPL) and especially its part – International Criminal Law do refer to the Nuremberg Tribunal as the first international criminal tribunal. It is truth of course, but only if we take into account completed procedures, finalised in verdicts. On the other hand, if we try to perceive international criminal judiciary in the perspective of 100 years, other conclusion emerges. Period of the First World War, finalised in peace treaties, shows us somewhat different perspective. Peace treaties between Allied and Associated Powers at one side and for example Germany (Treaty of Versailles, 1919), Turkey (Peace Treaty of Serves, 1920), Bulgaria (Treaty of Neuilly, 1919) on the other side prescribed that special tribunals should be constituted. Although none of planned tribunals was created, intention to create them stipulated within the peace treaties does present major shift in the system of the International Public Law. The idea that an international criminal tribunal should be constituted, with the task to prosecute perpetrators of international crimes, no matter whether they are tsar, king, ministers or soldiers, was profound novelty in the system of the IPL. Thus, this first step towards international criminal judiciary should be celebrated and remembered.

International criminal justice has not been let unsatisfied completely, though. Results of Leipzig trials are often marked as unsatisfactory. Indeed, if we compare the fact that 899 persons were accused with the fact that only 6 were found guilty, its impact could be challenged. Its legacy though is fruitful. It comprises all international criminal tribunals constituted through the 20th and 21st century, starting with the Nuremberg Trial.

There is yet another set of prosecutions from this period that should be mentioned especially. Armenian massacre, according to the Treaty of Sevres, should have been prosecuted before an international military tribunal. Meanwhile, Turkey has gone through the revolution and completely new political system has been introduced. Allies, willing to support new government with the Mustafa Kemal Ataturk as the leader, completed new peace treaty with Turkey – Treaty of Lausanne from 1923. New Turkish government formed a number of military tribunals, prosecuted some of the high levelled state officials for Armenian massacre and sentenced them.

3 Allies that signed the Treaty of Lausanne were British Empire, Italy, France, Japan, Greece, Romania, Kingdom of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes.
Sentenced to death were Talaat Pasha, Minister of Interior, Ismail Enver Pasha, Minister of War and Ahmet Djemal Pasha, Minister of Navy. They were sentenced in absentia.\textsuperscript{1} Yet, their sentences have been completed by the Armenian Revolutionary Federation in the Operation Nemesis.\textsuperscript{2}

Brief overview and recall of the genesis of the international criminal judiciary is just a prelude for the overview of fundamental changes that have occurred after the Second World War. After Nuremberg and Tokyo tribunals finalised proceedings and sentenced a number of high ranking state officials, it became clear that in the future new international criminal tribunals can emerge.

It should be stressed that the genesis of the international criminal judiciary does not end presenting just courts planned or organised by states. At the same time, throughout the whole 20\textsuperscript{th} century scholars of international law and international politics, members of pacifistic movements and law associations were thinking and planning on how to create a universal criminal court. The idea was based on the successful establishment and work of international courts for state disputes. Indeed, the idea was reasonable.

Thus, through the whole period two main ideas were colliding - opting for a permanent, universal, international criminal court or \textit{ad hoc} tribunals on the case by case basis.

There is still no answer to this dilemma. The end of the 20\textsuperscript{th} century brought us both types of international criminal courts. In its last decade two \textit{ad hoc} tribunals were established and one permanent court. If we try to formulate main, governing principle on international criminal judiciary following this pattern it would be impossible. Thus the following paper aims to come to conclusion on the issue – are we moving towards one permanent international criminal system or international community still prefers decentralised international criminal judiciary.

\section*{Contemporary International Criminal Courts Architecture}

At the moment there are one permanent international criminal court, two \textit{ad hoc} international tribunals and several hybrids, mixed, internationalised criminal courts. If we focus on the chronology of their occurrence then order would be somewhat different. First two \textit{ad hoc} tribunals emerged: International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) was established in 1993; International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) in 1994.\textsuperscript{3} International Criminal Court (ICC) was established in 1998.\textsuperscript{4} After creation of the ICC several mixed, internationalised courts emerged.

\end{footnotes}
The ICTY was established by the UN Security Council resolution 827 (1993) of 25 May 1993. It is located in The Hague, the Netherlands. Its formal name is International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991. The foundation for its establishment was found in the incapability and avoidance of all ex-Yu states to prosecute perpetrators of international crimes. Governing principle of the international criminal policy in this particular case was that impunity was unacceptable and that the reconciliation could be achieved only through the procedure carried out by the international, impartial criminal court.

The ICTR was established by the UN Security Council resolution 955 (1994) of 8 November 1994. It is located in Arusha, Tanzania. Its formal name is International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States between 1 January and 31 December 1994. While the ICTY was founded on the pure decision of the UN Security Council state-members, establishment of the ICTR was requested by the new Rwandan government. Government in Rwanda, founded after violations, was aware of its incapability to deal with horrible crimes that have occurred in Rwanda. The ICTY thus presented the most acceptable pattern for the criminal prosecution of the genocide crimes.¹

It should be underlined that legality of the ICTY was challenged in all ex-Yu states and by the majority of accused. On the other hand the ICTR didn’t raise issues on legality. Such procedural weakness was important and resulted in creation of the ICC in terms of international treaty. Its Statute has gone through the whole negotiating procedure typical for international treaties. It was adopted on the conference in Rome on 17 July 1998 and entered in force on the 1st July 2002. The official seat of the Court is in The Hague, Netherlands, but its proceedings may take place anywhere. The ICC also maintains an office in New York and field offices in Kampala, Kinshasa, Bunia, Abéché and Bangui.

Creation of the permanent court is marked with two important facts. Primarily, the attempts to create a permanent criminal court have been deliberated for decades, since the establishment of the UN. Several commission were organised, several versions of draft statutes have been produced with no result. Secondly, its final establishment is due to the climate created by the existence of ad hoc tribunals. Once those ad hoc international criminal courts were created it became much easier to go with the permanent court and yet to leave on states decisions whether to ratify it. On the other hand, when speaking in terms of morality, there was no ground not to create it. At the end a court was created as an independent body, not being the part of the UN system, yet closely related to it.\footnote{Sadat (2008).}

The founding idea was to create an international criminal court that would be permanent and universal. It is permanent no doubt, but is it universal? At the moment there are 123 state-parties. At the same time states such as the USA, Israel, Russia, Ukraine, China, India, Iraq, Iran, Libya, Syria, and Pakistan are missing. This is exactly the turning point – has the Court that have been created fulfilled the goals of its establishment? Do we have a universal court or not? And what is its future?

Before coming out with conclusions to these dilemmas it is necessary to go on with the overview of other criminal courts. Although permanent court was created, international community i.e. UN prolonged with creation of new arrangements for the prosecution of most important international crimes perpetrators.

New model of court was in form of mixed, hybrid criminal courts rather than new \textit{ad hoc} international court. Thus, several courts were founded.

Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL) was created by the UN in January 2002. Initiative to create a court was addressed by the Government of Sierra Leone to the UN. In the situation similar to Rwanda, new government was aware of its incapability to prosecute those responsible for atrocities during a decade long (1991-2002) civil war. However, the arrangement with the UN turned in different direction. In the case of Sierra Leone a court that was created combined international and national criminal law. It combined courts stuff – judges and the office of the prosecutor, creating mixed teams of international and national lawyers. It was decided to base the court in the country where the atrocities were committed, opposite to \textit{ad hoc} tribunal’s logic. Governing \textit{ratio} was to prosecute perpetrators bearing the greatest responsibility as primarily responsible. Thus, SCSL presents new form of an international i.e. internationalised criminal court. New model of international criminal court should be more productive, faster and cheaper than ICTY and ICTY. Finally, it did come out with good results and became residual mechanism.

The Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC) is a special tribunal for Cambodia, organised as well as a hybrid internationalised court. It was established on March 2003 in cooperation between the UN and the Cambodian government with the goal to try members of the Khmer Rouge. Its genesis is quite similar to the SCSL. The initiative was addressed by Cambodian government to the UN, with the proposal of organizing a special chamber within the legal system of Cambodia. The ground for such an agreement was found in the fact that atrocities that should have been prosecuted occurred in the period between 1975 and 1979. Agreement provided that the Chamber should consist of mixed stuff members, both international and national lawyers and that it should apply both international and national law. Its task was also to prosecute perpetrators who held the most important position within the Khmer Rouge organization.

Another special tribunal was created for the specific crimes that occurred in Lebanon. Unlike the previously mentioned courts this court has no jurisdiction over core international crimes, but its jurisdiction rests solely on the crime of terrorism. In fact, its primary jurisdiction is based on the one attack that occurred on 14 February 2005, when 23 persons were killed, among them Lebanese Prime Minister Hariri. Its overall jurisdiction is though expanded to the crimes connected to the 14 February attack, which were completed in the period 2004/2005. This court is titled as the Special Court for Lebanon, though, with the seat in the Netherlands. The Court is, by its type, is also hybrid court, although it applies only national law. Its internationalised character could be found in the mixed staff, since the prosecutor is international lawyer and trial chambers are consisted of both international and national lawyers. The establishment of the Special Tribunal for Lebanon were two fold. First step toward the establishment of such a court was undertaken between the UN and the representatives of Lebanese government. Yet, ratification of the agreement was not accepted by the Lebanese Parliament. The court was finally established by the UN Security Council Resolution 1757 on 2007. It bears mentioning that Resolution was adopted with 10 votes in favour and 5 abstentions – China, Qatar, Indonesia, Russia and South Africa. Legal ground for such an act was found in the Chapter VII of the UN Charter.

Thus, the Special Tribunal for Lebanon is the first court, after the ICTY that was created by the UN Security Council Resolution, with no clear support of the state who initially has the jurisdiction over these crimes.

Specific type of hybrid courts are chambers or panels, even courts formed in states or territories under the international administration or mission. Such form of hybrid courts also combines international element in their work, often in the composition of chambers or in the office of the prosecutor. Such courts are for example Special Panel for Serious Crimes for East Timor and War Crimes Chamber in the Court of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

As the conclusion for this part of the paper several thesis could be underlined. Primarily, there is no one predominant model for international criminal judiciary. Currently three types of courts have been recognised – permanent, ad hoc and hybrid. Another terminology could be introduced as well – permanent international, ad hoc international and ad hoc internationalised. It is worth mentioning that hybrid courts are also ad hoc, not permanent courts. Nevertheless the term hybrid, mixed or internationalised court has been accepted as the term marking the combined approach, combining both international law and national law, international and national lawyers – judges and prosecutors. Secondly, there is a pattern for the prevailing model. After international criminal judiciary emerged at the end of 20th century and the very beginning of the 21st century ad hoc courts were chronologically first, second was permanent court and third were hybrid courts. Is there a pattern, can we conclude on the prevailing model for the future? The same question can be posed in different manner - what is the real status of the ICC and its impact in the field of international criminal justice today?

Current Status of the International Criminal Court

It has been stated that current member-status consists of 123 states. That fact means that crimes committed on the territory of 123 states can be prosecuted before the ICC. It further means that even citizens of non-state parties could be brought before the ICC.

The ICC currently prosecutes 22 cases, arising from 9 situations. All of them occurred at the African continent. This fact has been the ground for severe criticism of Courts work, implying racism, discrimination and new frustrations for African states.\(^1\)

Besides mentioned cases, the ICC`s Office of the Prosecutor (OTP), at the moment conducts preliminary examination in situations of Afghanistan, Georgia, Guinea, Columbia, Honduras, Korea and Nigeria. Thus, for the first time the scope of the work has been expanded to Europe, Asia, and America.

Some other information, concerning further preliminary examinations, are also important to be mentioned here. The Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda received on 10 January 2014 information alleging the responsibility of high British officials, members of armed forces, for war crimes in Iraq, in the period between 2003 and 2008.\(^2\) The dossier was presented by Public Interest Lawyers (PIL) and the European Centre for Constitutional and Human Rights (ECCHR), citing more than 400 individual cases, representing “thousands of allegations of mistreatment amounting to war crimes of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.” The Prosecutors decided to re-open a preliminary examination of the situation in Iraq.\(^3\) Such decision has been welcomed by human rights activists and supporters of international criminal justice, as a step that have potential to reaffirm Court`s role in the international community.

The previous example, although registered as “situation in Iraq”, grounds jurisdiction on the British citizenship of perpetrators, since Great Britain is member-state to the Statute of the ICC. New investigation concerns crimes committed in Ukraine in the recent past. This state is not a member-state to the ICC. It is worth mentioning that Ukraine signed the Rome Statute in 2000, but

\(^2\)First information addressed to the OTP alleging war crimes by British armed forces in Iraq was not accepted. Previous Prosecutor Mr. Luis Moreno Ocampo decided not to open preliminary examination on the ground of non-sufficient gravity establishing the jurisdiction of the ICC, http://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/donlyres/04D143C8-19FB-466C-AB77-4CDB2FDEBEF7/143682/OTP_letter_to_senders_re_Iraq_9_February_2006.pdf

couldn’t ratify it since Ukraine Constitutional Court found that such a treaty is incompatible with Ukraine’s Constitution. Nevertheless, Ukraine showed its interest for cooperation with the ICC again, accepting its jurisdiction over alleged crimes committed in the period 21 November 2013 - 22 February 2014.\textsuperscript{1} This period marks Maidan Square demonstrations and use of force by then Government of Ukraine. This time there were no references to the stand of the Constitutional Court, neither by Ukraine representatives, nor Court’s officials. Limited jurisdiction in great deal communicates with the issue of compatibility. Thus, Court couldn’t expand its jurisdiction to the overall civil war period. This is the first time that a non-state party made a self-referral, concentrating it exclusively to one person, thus leaving open wide space for speculations on the real interests of Ukraine in this potential proceedings.

Another novelty for the Court is enrolment of the new member – Palestine. Palestine formally became member-state of the Rome Statute on 1 April 2015. In January 2015, though, it lodged a declaration accepting jurisdiction of the ICC over alleged crimes committed "in the occupied Palestinian territory, including East Jerusalem, since June 13, 2014."\textsuperscript{2} Reason for submitting the declaration at almost at the same time as ratifying the Statute is (i) \textit{rationae temporis} jurisdiction of the Court and (ii) Palestinian status as a state. Previously, Palestine lodged declaration in 2009 initiating preliminary examination. Yet, its declaration was not accepted since at that time Palestinian status as a state was not clear. After Palestine gained status of non-member observer State in the UN, ICC decided to accept its declaration and enroll Palestine as a new member-state.

Another interesting issue emerged before the ICC considers atrocities committed by members of the ISIS (Islamic State of Iraq and Syria). The OTP has been informed in various forms and by various actors on alleged different international crimes. Thus, the Prosecutor issued statement explaining that the Court does not have territorial jurisdiction over crimes, since Iraq and Syria are not member-states.\textsuperscript{3} On the other hand, the Court can establish personal jurisdiction, over ISIS members from states members of the Statue (such as Jihadi John for example) or through the referral by the UN Security Council.\textsuperscript{4} Possibility of the UN SC referral was discussed at its meeting on 27 March 2015. Meeting was initiated by the French Foreign Minister Laurent Fabius. Discussion at the meeting showed lack of consent on whether a referral should/could concern only situation in one state or in two states (Iraq and Syria), does referral of the situation means exclusively referral of a situation in a state or it can also mean situation as a matter and even cases. Meeting did not provide final stance on whether and in what form to opt for referral.

\textsuperscript{4}The Prosecutor stated: “The information gathered indicates that several thousand foreign fighters have joined the ranks of ISIS in the past months alone, including significant numbers of State Party nationals from, \textit{inter alia}, Tunisia, Jordan, France, the United Kingdom, Germany, Belgium, the Netherlands and Australia” – \textit{Ibid}.

Overviewing presented novelties in the work of the ICC several conclusions could be drawn. First conclusion is that the ICC acts. It is recognised as a judicial forum. States as well as individuals, i.e. associations or NGO’s do refer information to the Court. In the most general terms that indicate that the Court is accepted. At least it indicates that such a forum is needed. On the other hand, examples of declarations submitted by Ukraine and Palestine do show another trend. It shows again eagerness to prosecute ex post facto. Such approach is typical for ad hoc courts and opposite to legally accurate jurisdiction pro futuro. Such a conclusion indicates that Court is still in need to uphold its presence and importance.

International criminal courts architecture is not finalised. At the moment one another court is to be created – a court dealing with war crimes that occurred at the territory of Kosovo in the period 1998/2000.

An idea to form special criminal court for crimes committed at the territory of Kosovo is as old as the United Nations Mission on Kosovo (UNMIK). First proposal was to establish Kosovo War and Ethnic Crimes Court, similar to the ICTY. It would have primacy over domestic courts, which would also be authorised to prosecute international crimes perpetrators. Although foundation of the court has gone through the first preparation phase, at the end it was not created. One of the reasons for such a decision was concurrent jurisdiction with the ICTY.

Need to establish a special international criminal court for the international crimes perpetrated at Kosovo, emerged once again in the period 2010 - 2014. The fact that crimes occurred at Kosovo weren’t prosecuted, either by the ICTY or Kosovo courts, appeared due to the Council of Europe report, completed by Dick Marty. While exploring Kosovo situation Dick Marty discovered facts on organ trafficking connected to war crimes that occurred on the territory of Kosovo and north Albania, during the period 1998-2000. In his findings a number of Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) members were accused of abduction and forced organ removal. It is worth mentioning that such information was not completely new, only presented in more detail manner. Karla del Ponte, the former Prosecutor at the ICTY was aware of these crimes.

1. UN Security Council 7419th meeting, 27 March 2015, S/PV.7419
Yet again, her stand was that the ICTY could not establish jurisdiction since organs were removed from human bodies on the territory of Albania, where Albania was not under the jurisdiction of the ICTY.\footnote{Šurlan (2014b) 67-76.}

Since Dick Marty’s Report did not present document in terms of criminal investigation suitable to raise indictment, the European Union established an autonomous investigative body based outside of Kosovo namely Special Investigative Task Force (SITF). American investigator, though, Clint Williamson, was named for the first chief prosecutor of that EU body.

Williamson produced his report on July 2014, stating that he established enough evidence for indictments against former senior KLA officials. His findings were on organised campaign of abduction, illegal detentions, unlawful killings and sexual violence directed against Serbs and Roma mainly. Findings on forced organ removal were largely consistent with Dick Marty’s Report, but yet again there were no enough evidence to merit indictment for that crime.

The final and the most important impact of Williamson’s Report is the urge to create a special court. Since the period when Report was delivered up to know, several versions on the future court were on the table. In the first days after Report, it was clear that a court to come should be international criminal court, probably in the version of hybrid international criminal court, seated outside Kosovo. Even preliminary negotiations were carried out with the Government of the Netherlands. As the time was passing more ideas and propositions were arising. The last version that could be heard through media is the strong belief that such a court should be organised in Kosovo, applying Kosovo law. Although such a court should operate within the Kosovo justice system it should appoint international judges and prosecutors, acquiring thus the status of the hybrid international court. EU member states such as Spain have been reluctant to endorse a court that would recognise Kosovo as a state and implement its laws because they reject Kosovo’s secession. Greece, Slovakia, Romania and Cyprus also refuse to recognise Kosovo’s secession from Serbia.

Although there is still no court Special Investigative Task Force is still operating. On December 2011 new chief prosecutor was appointed – David Schwendiman. His main tasks are to continue investigation and assist in the creation of the court.

Conclusion

Today international criminal courts architecture is quite clear. As described, international law produced three types of international criminal courts, all of them in the close relation with the United Nations. Still, future emergence and development of new courts is not clear. At this point it is important to underline that primary jurisdiction over international crimes hold states. Theoretically that means that if states are properly governing their criminal justice system, there would be no need for international criminal courts. But, as history has thought us it is not likely.

International community is decentralised and it plans to stay that way. If we start from that point it is clear that future will produce more ad hoc courts. Yet again, examples of Ukraine, Palestine and British officials do present stimulus for belief in the ICC and its brighter future.

What is learnt from present examples? The most important message is that there is no winner in the competition of the best court model. Ad hoc hybrid courts, as the last version, did not prove to be better solution then ad hoc tribunals. They are cheaper though and thus there is at least one clear advantage.

What is for sure is that international criminal courts are not novelty any more, international community is successfully struggling against impunity and there are yet more new courts to be created. We do live in the time of strong diversification of international criminal judiciary.
